Covid-19 has spread across the world thus, in response, the government implemented travel restrictions wherein the Philippines restrict travel from different countries. Its purpose is to slow down the transmission of the virus. However, it creates a significant impact on the operation of airline companies. The objective of the study is to analyze how airline companies cope up with the changes in operation. To determine how travel restrictions reshape the operation of the airline companies. As well as to provide awareness to future airline companies regarding the impacts of the travel restrictions. This research determines the negative impacts of travel restrictions on the operations of airline companies in the Philippines through surveys and interviewing employees who experience the problem. This shows that it affects flight operation, finance, and employees. It is hypothesized that the airline company cannot survive in this kind of situation as it restrains their operation to be effective. However, 35.64% of the respondents slightly agreed that the airline industry can cope up due to 34.65% of them strongly agreeing that employees can adapt to the changes. That causes airline companies to keep up also; there are different strategies that enable them to be efficient in this time.
